Definition of Human Security

It was UNDB Human development Report 1994 , which , for the first time , explicitly articulated the importance of human security as tool of policy making and implementation . Simultaneously Canada , Japan and Norway proposed human security centric governance initiatives in domestic and foreign policy options . However , while analyzing the origin and development of the concept it is impertinent to go beyond the UN interpretations and recent policy debates . Concerns towards human security and attempt to criticize traditional security centric notions appeared even during the cold war . Human security consists two important point :

Freedom from fear

Freedom from want

1. Characteristics of human security :

Human security depends on a set of characteristics . Here we mention a number of them :

- A comprehensive concept that includes all countries of the world with all its capabilities given the common external threats that affect individuals everywhere , such as terrorism and drugs , so any transgression by all countries to stop it and prevent its recurrence.
- It is concerned with the security of people and the conditions related to each person to achieve social justice , as it moves away from military solutions to solve problems and focuses on concern for individuals and human development .
- The most important slogan of human security is prevention is better than cure , so care is taken to avoid problems and solve them before they escalate , thus avoiding conflicts between individuals in the same society.

2. Aspect of Human security :

- Economic security
- Health security
- Environmental security
- Personal security
- Community societal security
- Political security
